

At which level do 3M, Google, GoPro, and your company compete?

- 3M (Level 0) - 3M is probably one of the greatest product innovators in corporate history and it has served them well. Yet, if they mastered business model innovation, they could probably double or triple their revenues in a few years.
- Google (Level 2) - Google's business model is a gold mine built around search. To date, Google hasn't produced any substantial business model innovation, though the company is a formidable product and technology innovator. Most successful innovations at Google (e.g. Android) support the initial search business model. Currently, no other business model has been able to challenge them, but that might happen faster than expected.
- GoPro (Level 0) - GoPro has been very successful since about 2009 and produced incredible revenue growth with its camera products. They are still mainly focused on technology and products. Can their current business model survive the growing competition from other product innovators like Sony with similar value propositions? Time will tell.
- Your Company - Only you know the answer. But now you could become an "invincible" business model competitor.
